The rapid progress of genomic sequencing projects, their lower cost and the absence of sequencing errors have made it feasible to compare the evolutionary rate (dN, dS) of protein coding genes across species. With the aid of theoretical and empirical studies, it is possible to identify genes that have been under positive selection and those that are evolving neutrally. Evidence for selection based on patterns of molecular evolution is expected to be biased if both positive and negative selection are acting. To date, studies have shown that there is no significant association between the extent of codon bias and the extent of selection. In this review, we discuss the effects of selective constraint and the influence of sequence differences between orthologues on sequence evolution.Q: Discord.py: Putting items in a category by dragging them into a category window There are some.gifs of the game I'm trying to make in a category window.
