For a complete bipartite graph G the number of perfect matchings is well known to be $\binom{m}{2}/2$ for odd m and 0 for even m (since G can be partitioned into two perfect matchings). I've tried to prove this formula with a different approach by considering the number of perfect matchings of G minus the number of perfect matchings of G minus the number of perfect matchings of G minus the number of perfect matchings of G and somehow I can't see what to do with the minus signs. Edit: I think I figured it out, the problem is that the minus signs are messing me up. I'll post a comment and an answer. A: I figured it out, the problem is that the minus signs are messing me up. NEW DELHI: Two former government officials have been arrested for graft after they allegedly embezzled Rs 74.65 lakh from a department under the ministry of housing and urban affairs in Maharashtra. The two former officials, Rakesh Jain and Rajendra Narkar, were allegedly involved in the siphoning of funds from the department. According to the police, Jain, then in-charge of the department's building and landscape development department and Narkar, departmental engineer, were accused of misappropriating funds meant for repairs and improvements in buildings and land of the department in Maharashtra. They were arrested on Tuesday in connection with the case. The accused were suspended and were waiting for a week before they were sent on leave. However, the two men approached the Indian Administrative Service (IAS) service from where they were inducted into the department. "Before joining the department, both of them had given a written request to the ministry seeking transfer. They were granted leave to the ministry and the 4bc0debe42
