Iran has a long and bloody history with unruly converts to Islam. When Christians (like St. Thomas) are required to prove their faith in Muhammad, there are often violent consequences. Iran, the Islamic Republic of Iran, has a long and bloody history with unruly converts to Islam. When Christians are required to prove their faith in Islam, there are often violent consequences. In the Iranian case, a father took his daughter out of school and then turned her over to a mullah, who beat her and stoned her to death. The father was arrested and tried for murder. The court sentenced him to 99 lashes, but he was released after 22. The father, Ali Fadakhi, is a good example of the poor treatment of converts to Islam in Iran. He was asked to prove he had converted from Christianity to Islam. But, he said, he had converted from Islam to Christianity when his wife was Muslim and he was forced to convert as a condition of their marriage. He said that he converted to Christianity, and then to Islam, because of his wife. That was true, but it didn't matter. In the Islamic Republic of Iran, it is illegal for converts to Christianity to change religions. "In the Islamic Republic of Iran, it is illegal for converts to Christianity to change religions," said the Rev. Yousef Naderi of the Iranian Church, according to Life Site News. "Yet, the Iranian government allows Baha'is to change religions, but not Christians. Baha'is can lose their religious convictions at any time." Fadakhi converted to Islam at a time when the Iranian government encouraged people to convert to Islam. Fadakhi is just one of the thousands of Christians who have converted to Islam and then had their old beliefs and lifestyles beaten out of them. At the time of the Iranian Revolution, the country was ruled by the atheist Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi. A clergyman, Ayatollah Khomeini, led the revolution and forced the Shah to go into exile. The clergy wanted to take control of the country
