Set in just a couple of thousand years, the Nordic Bronze Age (c. 1800–1200 BCE) represents the height of the Stone Age. The creation of Bronze Age settlements spread throughout northern Europe – and Scandinavia in particular – bringing with them a societal and economic transformation. The technical achievements of the Bronze Age are great; ceramics, pottery, utensils, weapons, tools, and buildings were all produced with advanced technology. More people lived in settlements than ever before. The developments in manufacturing techniques and new ways of producing things allowed for the development of an entirely new society, and the language changed, reflecting the changing society. The advent of Bronze Age society was an era of metalworking. The manufacturing techniques required for producing ceramics, metalworking tools, and many other objects used by the people were unknown until about 5,000 years ago, long before the advent of bronze. Stone and bone was used for tools and materials, but only bronze could be used as a metal. During the Bronze Age, the majority of metals used for tools and weapons were made from iron ores. As most of the tools and weapons were made of metal, they required a high level of metalworking knowledge to be made. Bronze Age people used bronze to make items such as axes, knives, and swords. People were buried with weapons and tools, indicating that the people also used their own metal to make these items. The materials were traded over long distances. We know that people traded at least over the Baltic region. It was a global society that traded with other societies and, within Scandinavia, traded with the North Sea and the Baltic. **Stone Age** The Stone Age, also known as the Neolithic Period, is the period of time before the Bronze Age (from around 7000 to 3000 BCE). It is when our ancestors started to live in societies, instead of small groups of hunter-gatherers. The main difference between the Stone Age and the Bronze Age is that the Stone Age was an agricultural society, whereas the Bronze Age was an agrarian society

Paladin Multi-Search is an attempt to combine the power of several search engines into one application that allows you to search for anything, including images and videos, as well as to conveniently switch between engines when you need to. The principle that Paladin Multi-Search works upon can return great results, if exploited the right way. By embedding some of the most popular search engines, it simplifies tedious web search tasks, managing to appeal to a very wide audience. Sporting a simple design, Paladin Multi-Search holds all of its features inside the main window, in plain sight. Just under the field dedicated to the search terms, two menus are located, allowing you to select the search engine, as well as the target type of content (web, images or videos). The list of supported search engines includes Google, Yahoo, YouTube, Bing, Ask and Duck Duck Go; simply select the preferred one, enter your expression and hit the 'Search' button. On the downside, there is no option to select multiple search engines at a time, which means that you'll have to perform more searches to get results for the same keyword on more than one engine. The search results will be automatically delivered inside the system's default browser. Of course, the convenience of a built-in web browser would have been much appreciated for quicker access to the results, although this approach doesn't bother either. On an ending note, Paladin Multi-Search is not the first or the last application that has a multi-search task in mind. However, the approach might be a little too simple to compete with bigger sharks. Platforms: Windows, Mac OS X, iOS, Android ... which results it brings up. So I've been trying to figure out what to do with all of these extra results. I'm guessing that I don't actually have any files on my phone that have these as their results and I'm not sure where the results that I do have are coming from. This is a sample of the result that I get:
