The 'organization' of the human brain. A review of recent literature that sheds light on the state of knowledge on the organization of the human brain reveals several trends, trends that contradict long-held beliefs and preconceived notions. There is increasing evidence that the human brain has a degree of organization and purpose that is not related to survival per se. The organization of the human brain is in part species specific, in part culture specific, and in part in part time specific. The evidence for three major trends is discussed: 1) there are separate fiber tracks for receptive and specific types of sensory information; 2) there is separate fiber track(s) in the motor cortex for sensory and motor function; 3) there are separate circuit pathways for the acquisition and retention of knowledge. There is also some discussion of the major ancillary systems of the brain, including the vestibular system and the immune system, that are involved in planning, controlling, and interpreting the many types of sensory information that are received by the brain. These developments and the state of knowledge on the organization of the brain clearly indicate that, by a century from now, there will be not be one organ (brain) for all our functions, but multiple organs, each specialized to its' task. Various types of flame detectors, including remote monitoring devices for sensing the presence of a fire, have been provided, but have suffered from a number of
