1. Field of the Invention The present invention is directed to the field of speech recognition, specifically, to systems for recognizing spoken commands as inputs to computer programs.

2. Description of the Related Art The use of speech recognition systems is well known in the computer industry, particularly for dictating and storing computer program instructions. Speech recognition systems are also used to create computer games where, in addition to the command words (i.e., menu commands, inventory commands, location commands, etc.), player commands can be voiced by the player for input to the computer. The player commands may determine the selection of characters, and the background, the type of game, and the like. Speech recognition systems are also used for the disabled, who may be unable to manipulate a keyboard in order to type text into a computer. Speech recognition is also used for entertainment purposes, providing game results and pre-recorded messages or music to suit the mood and preference of the listener. The choice of a speech recognition system is dependent upon the user's specific application. The choice may be based upon the need to recognize a large number of words, the need to recognize as many different voices as possible or the need to recognize a single voice or even just a single word. The larger number of words that must be recognized, the greater the cost of a speech recognition system, since a device with a large memory to store the words has to be employed. The lower the number of words that are recognized, the smaller the hardware of the speech recognition system, because a limited memory can be employed. Moreover, the lower the number of words that are recognized, the fewer languages that can be supported. For example, if only a small number of words are recognized, only a limited number of variations in accents, languages or speech volumes can be accommodated. There are several disadvantages to the use of text based input, such as using keyboard devices. First, the training process which teaches the computer how to recognize the words from the user's voice, is quite extensive. The user must provide numerous samples of speech in which he/she speaks the words, stored in the computer. This process takes considerable time and can introduce errors into the system. In addition, the additional training time forces the user to delay the process of using the computer. Speech recognition systems also can be quite expensive, costing thousands of dollars. Many of these systems
